

See all Culture

20 three-hour films worth every minute of your time

Seen The Brutalist and have many, many more hours to spare? Then watch these great

You're in control

We and our 251 trusted partners may use cookies and similar technologies to help make the Telegraph available online. These cookies may access your personal data, such as your IP address and browsing behaviour on your device.

Some cookies can't be turned off as they are necessary to ensure our website functions correctly and to protect against things like fraud. Others are optional, and where you accept these, we use them to improve your experience and support our services.

If you choose not to accept, we will still show you advertising, but we won't use cookies to personalise these adverts for you.

Find out more in our privacy policy. You can change your preferences and manage your choices at any time via the "Manage Cookies" link, in the footer of each page.

You can agree to these cookies by clicking "Yes I accept".

You can manage your cookie choices now, or opt out where legitimate interest is relied on by our partners to use your data, by clicking "Manage".

Yes, I accept

No, thank you

Manage

We use cookies and similar technologies for the following purposes

Store and/or access information on a device

Precise geolocation data, and identification through device scanning

Personalised advertising and content, advertising and content measurement, audience research and services development

Alexander Larman

31 January 2025 11:34am GMT

It is looking more than likely that Brady Corbet's masterly epic The Brutalist will sweep both the Baftas and Oscars after its recent success at the Golden Globes. This will be despite – or perhaps because of – its truly staggering 215 minute running time, although this does, helpfully, include a 15-minute interval factored into the picture, which gives audiences a welcome chance to recover from the